In the beginning...

In the beginning there were simple shopping carts. Internet businesses would carry out the daily routine of printing internet orders, manually entering order data into their CRM software, and typing in customer addresses into shipping software. Data entry was always redundant, creating a backlash of human error and inefficiency.

Tracking inventory was guesswork at best. Simple questions such as, "Which vendor was this product purchased from?" and "How many of this product is in stock?" were left unanswered. The only answers were found in the hands of expensive and complicated inventory management systems which were beyond the reach of most small internet business owners.

Internet marketing is one of the largest ongoing expenses for the majority of internet businesses. In the beginning, there was no easy way to track your ROI and conversion ratio. Successful entrepreneurs strive for converted sales, not just clicks. Without the ability to track your conversion internet marketing is no longer a strategy. It is just an expense.

How much time do you spend managing the nuts and bolts of your business every day? How much valuable time can a completely integrated solution save your internet business? Are you still conducting eBusiness as if you are "in the beginning?"
